LOVED AND LOST. By Miss R. Fisher.

It was in the years that have vanished-And many a year ago-That I wandered down in the meadow, Where the blood-red strawberries grow. But down in the valley meadow,

I wandered not all alone, For a maiden's graceful shadow Fell soft beside my own.

White as the fragrant hawthorn, That blossome l along our way, Under its golden ringlets, Her blue-veined forehead lay. And blue as the skies of summer. The hue of her azn ceye; And her voice like the musical murmur

Of the south wind drifting by.

The sunbeams slant and golden, Played hide and seek in the trees; And over our heads went roving Bright butterflies and bees. And all the little brooklets Sang songs in a merry tune;

For it was in the pleasant summer And the pleasant month of June. O'er the sea of verdure, Wherever our feet might pass, We watched the ebbing and flowing Of the tide of the meadow grass.

Till, hastening adown the valley, Fleet as the mountain roe, She cried: "Let us seek the meadow, Where the blood-red strawberries grow !"

With her dainty finger tips, I knew not which was the brightest, The fruit or her blood-red lips. Nor knew I which the sweetest-The kisses I stole away, Or the strawberries in the meadow, That beautiful summer day.

Then placking the berries so scarlet,

But I know that love-words tender, And many a vow, I said, Till on her cheek the blushes, Deepened to crimson red,-And the hours went gliding onward, Like a bright dream flitting away, Until the rosy sunset Shut softly the gates of day.

Then tenderly kissing the maiden, Who tremblingly clung to my side-There, in the valley meadow, We parted at eventide. Ah, me, in the olden memories, How my heart is all aglow; And again, as of old, do'I wander

Down where the strawberries grow. But on the slope of the meadow, On the grass in its billow-tide, I see no graceful shadow, Falling my own beside.

No more do I pilfer kisses-Kisses from blood-red lips, Nor feel the throbbing pulses Of dainty finger tips Ah, 't is but a dream! from the olden Meadow long leagues am I; And, alas! on her curls so golden, They have told me the grave-sods lie. How there came a time in the summer, When her voice grew faint and weak, Tho' her eye burned bright and brighter. Like the glow upon her check.

And she cried, in accents tender. "My footfall grows faint and slow, Yet ere I die, let me wander Once more where the strawberries grow. And tell ye my love when he cometh, And kneeleth my grave above, How my footsteps last were straying Where he told me first his love.

And when he sails over Death's river, I'll wellcome him first to the shore, Where summer is blooming forever, And we shall not part any more. And then, when the shadows of sunset

Fell soft o'er the hill-side to steep, She said, 'midst her tremulous breathings, "Now hush! I am going to sleep!" Now over my heart, wild surging,

Swings the sadening memory-tide, And I weep for the loss of my boyhood, Who thus in her beauty died .-
